Until now, these squishy chemicals have been classified as “emerging”, according to the Hazardous Substances Data Centre at the University of Sussex in England, although they are commonly used in British households. The group says that the nature of the data gathered on these compounds should be reviewed to avoid the dangers they pose to human health. “We are seeing a major shift, where in time many of these compounds, including the ones used in food preservation, could be re-classified as hazardous,” says Alan O’Neil of the environmental charity Surfers Against Sewage (SAS) in Brighton, UK. O’Neil has been campaigning to keep such compounds under surveillance since 1998, when he found that PEPCK, or 1-phenyl-2-thiocarbonyl-2-imidazoline, had been used to preserve chicken livers in US laboratories before it was classified as hazardous. PEPCK is now used as a popular preservative in British food production. The global movement to reassess these chemicals was kick-started by a meeting in 1996, where O’Neil heard representatives of some of the largest food and preservative companies in the US describing the potential dangers of PEPCK and many of its chemical relatives. “They were using them on food, as preservatives
